Art calendars available at businesses

Art calendars are available to pick up at businesses listed at www.northeastcdc.org.

Community Development Corporation, fiscal agent for the Northeast Minneapolis Arts District, worked through independent local jurors to choose images representing Northeast Minneapolis neighborhoods. The piece covers December 2018 to January 2020.

The artists: Josh Mortenson (00), Mark Peterson, Michael Anderson, Karen Kacso (2), Jason Jerkins, Lorentz Aubin, Alex Deiches, August Schwertfeger, Kara vy Wyck (cover), Patricia Canney, James Nutt, Jona Mortenson.

The quality and diversity of images and art mediums is spectacular, and a matte finish makes it writable.

Ceramic educators conference will show off the NE Arts District

The National Council on Education for the Ceramic Arts will hold its 53rd annual conference at the Minneapolis Convention Center. The annual NCECA conference will be the world’s largest event held in the field of ceramic arts, with 5,000 people attending March 27-30, 2019.

It will feature more than a dozen ceramic exhibitions as part of bus tours in the Northeast Minneapolis Arts District.

The conference will expose creative people and teachers from all over the nation to Northeast Minneapolis. It will also bring some of the best ceramic work from around the region and the country here for residents and fans to enjoy.

Watch for more info on how to attend, in March at www.northeastminneapolisartsdistrict.org.

NE sculptor Kordula Coleman’s art figures prominently in La Doña Cervecería

by Cynthia Sowden

A Mexican Day of the Dead ceramic figure by a German sculptor who lives in Northeast’s Wàte Park neighborhood is the centerpiece of Minnesota’s first Latin American brewery in the North Loop. La Doña Cervecería, 124 Fremont Ave. N., Kordula Coleman was commissioned in May to produce the sculpture which now adorns the brewery’s taproom. It was a challenge for the sculptor, who had attained journeyman status in a clay studio in Germany but had never produced anything as big as the piece for La Doña. “That work was for the masters,” she said. Blame it on James Bond.

She was inspired by the 2015 Bond movie, “Spectre,” which features a Dia de los Muertos parade, “I was mesmerized by the figures and captured by the colors,” she said. “I like the strong colors and the ritualistic aspects of the holiday.”

She said she appreciates how Mexican people “come closer to the spirit of the dead through photos, candles and ritual. That really resonates with me.”

She made a small Day of the Dead piece and sold it to someone. Soon, she was contacted by the brewery via Facebook Messenger. Could she re-create her piece on a larger scale for display at the brewery? “I was really excited,” she said. “The commission sounded too good to be true. It was a dream job.”

It was a dream with some nightmares. It took three months of hard work to produce the piece, which stands 32 inches tall. Throughout the process, Coleman battled summer humidity, which made the clay tend to slump and increased the risk of cracking during firing. “I worried about it keeping its shape,” she said.

“I could barely lift the skirt. It weighed 30 or 40 lbs. It was wet. Now it’s much lighter.” She also had to take care when she checked the kiln for the tourist on the skirt, again for fear of cracking. “I groped my way along,” she said. “I wondered, can I really do this? I was very relieved when everything came out of the firing kiln and it had not cracked or exploded.”

The result is La Doña (Spanish for “lady”), a Latina with flowing black hair and a sad expression behind her Dia de los Muertos mask.

La Doña Cerveceria is a public venue, which curator and founder, Sergio Manancero, is in the Elliott Park neighborhood. The owner, Sergio Manancero, the son of Uruguayan immigrants, is in the process of building the business’ impact on the community. Coleman attended the cerveceria’s grand opening in October and said the place was filled with people of all ages, from children to grandparents, dancing and mingling and snapping pictures of her creation. She said she often sees Instagram messages with La Doña in the background.

Coleman moved from Cologne, Germany, to the U.S. with husband Marc in 2000. She said she is honored to support the Hispanic community with her work.

For Dia de los Muertos, Meet Minneapolis hosted the Northeast Minneapolis Arts District in their Visitor Center at 505 Nicollet Mall during their First Thursdays lunchtime November 1. Artist Gustavo Lira fashioned an ofrenda to Frida Kahlo, and displayed tiles and cards featuring cartoon skeletons honoring the Mexican tradition. Bread from Chantalo, a local panadería, was also featured.
